First-world problems SOLVED!

HOTTIES

Condom giant Durex claims to have taken safe sex to the next level by releasing a smartphone app that enables our phones to sleep together. However, it turns out that we humanoid are still expected to do the nasty. But "at agreed times or by spontaneous agreement" (that'll be 11pm on Fridays then), the app puts couples' "handsets to sleep and removes all distractions". Well, not quite, you're still going to have to deal with the beer gut and curry breath.

You can burn those sexy padded, push-up under-wired bras, ladies, because a new feminist brand of underwear is here. The comfy lingerie from Neon Moon is called Mon Dieu, presumably because that's what French men say when they finally get your kit off and see your boobs dangling around your ankles. Sadly most women in the UK won't be able to enjoy this new-found freedom - the label only goes up to size 14.

NOTTIES

In this week's spooky news, visitors taking the Royal Albert Hall's new Secret History Tour are being told that during a Michael Bolton concert, several hundred people reported seeing a grey figure sitting in a supposedly empty seat. Bet after listening to that dirge, the ghost had wished he was headless.

We're all pooping gold, say bottom-dwelling boffins, who claim to have discovered a rich seam of gold, silver and copper in sewage treatment plants. Blimey, no wonder sales of luxury loo roll have gone up - it's surely only what our backsides deserve. Scientists now say gold diggers could extract the £500m of precious metals being flushed down British lavs every year. If word reaches the Playboy Mansion, Heffers will be left pushing his own bathchair.

Hurley's doing the biz on Liz

RUDE Britannia, Britannia rules the airwaves...

Long live The Royals - the raunchy new TV show that makes Liz Hurley back on our screens, this time as the Queen of England in a new US bonk-buster.

I haven't had this much fun watching telly since Dynasty's Krystle beat herself up in one of the most bizarre TV plots ever written. Although it looks like The Royals will be a hot contender to take that title.

It should be said that any resemblance in this daft parody to actual Royal personages is purely coincidental, as no one could accuse Liz of being anything like our real Queen, especially in the undergarments department. While our sovereign ruler is never happier than when out walking her corgis, Liz's Queen Helena is busy unleashing the dogs of war on her deviant family. She's the US fantasy of a British monarch: sexy, sadistic, swearier and wearing bits of flimsy lace where her drawers should be.

This show also finally proves Americans think all Brits are camp and conniving baddies, who'd hold a few strips of fabric together with a safety pin if they thought it would further their career. Oh, erm.

But whatever you say about La Hurley's acting skills, she sure knows how to lie back and think of England.

The 49-year-old actress claims Princess Di was her fashion inspiration, but Liz's randy monarch is more of a Queen of Tarts

RAMPANT Hurley

Liz can lie back and think of England than Hearts. She brings new meaning to "At Her Majesty's pleasure", but I don't want to ruin the only plot line for you.

Brought to our screens by cable station E!, a channel more used to pumping out celebrity drivel from red carpet events, this is their first scripted drama. And it's so bad... it's fabulous.

Even the characters' names are ridiculous: King Simon, Prince Liam, Queen Helena, Roger the footman (OK, I made that one up, but she does... frequently).

The sub plots mostly revolve around gorgeous young fillies trotting around in their undies.

If I didn't know any better, I'd think the show had been sponsored by Victoria's Secret.

Don't the scriptwriters know how cold and damp it is here in Blighty? We don't walk around in our undercrackers. Well, not without rubbing ourselves down with goose fat first.

Similarly, no one goes pheasant shooting on the white cliffs of Dover. It's so windy up there you're more likely to hit something in Calais.

And then there's the bloke whose office is behind the clock face of Big Ben. Surely the most obvious case of a man whose time is literally up?

As is only fitting, Queen Helena gets all the best lines (along with the family's coke-snorting Uncle Cyrus of course). "I smell supermodel!" she declares after sniffing her son Liam, and she's clearly not talking the perfume counter at Superdrug.

I just hope Liz realises this naughty TV series will be the closest she ever gets to seeing the inside of Buck Palace.

WHAT THE HASHTAGS SHOULD REALLY SAY...

How cold is it back home?

What am I packing peeps?

She's had her fair share of knockers over in the US, but actress Kelly Brook still can't face a cold front at home.

POLLY HUDSON IS AWAY

VIRAL VIDEO OF THE WEEK

YouTube - Gato malo: Thug Life

Proof if ever any was needed that cats are a cruel race.

TITLE: Thug Life cat

BEST LINE: Noooo... nononono... noooo (owner's pleas fade to a terrified whisper as she realises evil is in the room)

PLOT: After years of being forced to endure unconditional love from its owners, Fluffy Persian cat joins the local Triad gang and returns home to wreak revenge. First it tortures the TV remote control and pushes it off the top of the coffee table, then turns its psychotic attentions to an innocent shot glass. Just as the glass teeters, Persian's owner desperately tries to save its life. Cue gangster music that tells you something really bad is about to happen. "You really care about this little glass?" sneers Persian cat, then casually bats it off the edge and goes off to lick his nunchucks.
